JNMT at Work

The Journal of Nuclear Medicine Technology (JNMT) has provided its readers with many quality articles submitted by members of the nuclear medicine community. Frequently, these papers are oral presentations at local, regional, or national meetings, and these presentations provide satisfaction and reward for all your efforts. However, seeing your work in print is a more gratifying experience. Publication provides a permanent record of your work and sometimes has an impact on patient care beyond your own department. We are grateful to authors who diligently polish their work and submit it for review by their peers and possible publication. The primary function of the JNMT is to provide a mechanism for us to communicate with one another.

The JNMT also serves as a medium for further development of our individual skills by providing two Continuing Education series each year. This year the Continuing Education Committee and its invited authors gave us up-to-date information on Current Trends in Radiopharmaceuticals and Quantitative Imaging Techniques. For 1988 the committee has selected Clinical Patient Care and Instrumentation as the two topics for the two Continuing Education series.

Authors of Commentaries and Teaching Editorials have shared their experiences with clinical techniques to allow us to expand our capabilities in a variety of procedures.

At this time a special thanks goes to the following Society of Nuclear Medicine (SNM) members who have served as manuscript reviewers for the JNMT during 1987. Their volunteer efforts and time spent critiquing manuscripts contributes to the quality of the JNMT and helps the authors to more clearly project their ideas.
